Across the country, urban gardens are sprouting up, attracting community members to grow an assortment of plants, beans, and herbs. They grow up and out of the parking lots of offices and high-rise apartments, raising the canopy of their inner-city communities. Not all urban gardens are the same. With a few very important things in common — they are in public spaces, they rely on volunteers, and they grow food. But they are not all the same. There is no one right way to run an urban garden. What this means for you? It means you can adopt the methods you like the best to put your wild-food garden to work, no matter where you live.

1. Start small. In some cities, private gardens have a long history, and a history of management. But it is also becoming easier to start small and build your way up. There is a growing movement of local gardens that don't require a lot of land but do require a lot of commitment to keep a garden running. You can be a part of the movement, starting small.
2. Become a steward of your neighborhood. Sharing a garden with other neighbors is an important part of growing community. It helps to take a survey of your community, and ask what your neighbors want the garden to offer. There are resources available for designing urban gardens, but many of them are focused on gardening in private backyards and don't address the needs of urban communities. Start with a survey of your neighborhood.
3. Gardens build community. Gardens attract new neighbors to your neighborhood. There are generally very few restrictions on gardening in most places. If your city wants to be more restrictive, at least they will have the freedom to do that with a garden they don't pay for. Urban gardens give a neighbor or two a personal connection to your city, helping people to be a part of it. If your city has the will to grow, share a garden with others and encourage neighbors to join you.
4. Grow food – We all need food — especially when it comes to gardening. If you are looking for a specific food for your garden, like beans, consider planting a “kit”
