More than 100,000 Palestinians were wounded, many by live bullets, in the 17 days of bloodshed that followed last year's Gaza war. The grave of Muhammad Khaled, 22, from the village of Shati in the north of the Gaza Strip, sits in a wheat field about one kilometre from the border fence with Israel. The six-metre-high tomb has been a regular sight in the field for years. A small number of "revered" cadavers are said to lie in the tombs, including two relatives of Muhammad, who died in the fighting. Gaza's skyline is dominated by an unfinished UN school building on top of a hill and a row of white cranes which will become a vast new international community centre if it gets built. About 30 metres away is the fence which separates Gaza from Israel. It is not in the best of shape, with a number of small holes to allow bullets and smaller fragments of weapons to pass. On Saturday, a small group of young Palestinians gathered on the other side of the fence to throw stones at Israeli soldiers who were on the other side. For a large proportion of these young people, life is one of constant violence, of bombs, of wounding and of being wounded. They have often seen loved ones killed in battle or through Israeli air strikes. Ismail Al-Sheikh has had all four of his sons killed in the last three years. "I have not had a day of peace since my sons were killed," he says. Three of his sons died in the three-week 2014 war in Gaza. The youngest died in December of last year. "I went to the hospital to see if my son was dead," he says, adding that his older two sons were killed by an Israeli drone attack on a Palestinian house in the Jebaliya refugee camp in the south of Gaza. "That day I went to the room of my son and looked at his dead body," he says.

No matter if you work on a Mac, or use a Windows PC as a result, you have to agree that keyboard shortcuts are one of the best tools to help you improve your workflow. However, what if you want to edit something on a website using your keyboard? For example, say that you want to type a character such as an asterisk (*) or a pound (#) in order to quickly edit content. This might not work for everyone due to the fact that they are different keys on a keyboard, but the good news is that you don't need to be familiar with key combinations or any commands just to get the job done. In this article, we'll show you how to type things such as an asterisk or a pound using AutoHotkey. If you're wondering how this application works, it is an automation application that allows you to make key combinations to perform functions on a keyboard. What to do AutoHotkey is a keyboard macro program that works under Windows, Windows 7, and 8, as well as most Linux operating systems. The application is already installed on many computers by default, and you'll find it under the Start menu, or you can search for it on the web and download it as a portable file. As soon as the application loads, it lets you change the keyboard shortcut for a variety of functions. In fact, you can set any shortcut you want, so long as it is compatible with the keyboard you are using. For example, in the screenshot below, the LControl + RAlt + A command allows you to turn a display mirroring feature on and off. It is meant to mirror the display of a computer, but in the end, it also mirrors the keyboard on the same PC. NOTE: The screenshot is from Windows 7, but it's identical on Windows 8. Here's what it looks like on Windows 8. The application supports three different keyboard layouts, and it also lets you select the keyboard layout you are using. For example, English (US) keyboard would not display the same characters as for English (UK), and so on. For those with a French keyboard, you can use the Canadian keyboard layout. It is possible to assign different keyboard shortcuts to individual buttons, and change the function of a button by pressing it at the same time as a second button. This allows you to type things like * to create an asterisk, or # to enter a 1d6a3396d6

:)Allosteric effects of gamma-aminobutyric acid and glycine on the high affinity [3H]muscimol binding site in the chick retina. The allosteric effects of gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA) and glycine on the binding of [3H]muscimol to the high affinity GABA-benzodiazepine receptor in chick retina was investigated. GABA and glycine inhibited [3H]muscimol binding in a concentration-dependent manner. The inhibitory effect was surmounted by concentrations of GABA and glycine much higher than in the normal central nervous system. There was no effect of GABA and glycine on the binding of the agonist [3H]muscimol to the low affinity benzodiazepine binding site. These results suggest that the binding of [3H]muscimol to the high affinity benzodiazepine receptor in chick retina is allosterically regulated by the GABA and glycine receptor sites.
