Immunogenicity of hepatitis B vaccine in Malaysian children. Ten children with low birth weight between 1990 and 1993 were followed up for one year for HBsAg and anti-HBs status after receiving a dose of Twinrix vaccine. All received hepatitis B immunoglobulin post partum. Only one showed rise in anti-HBs after the fourth vaccine dose. The booster antibody titer was then determined 6 months later. There were no serological markers of failure. This further supported the safety of two-dose Hepatitis B immunoglobulin to young infants after the birth of their hepatitis B carrier mothers.Q: Is it possible to initialize all the properties using constructor in C#? In Java we can use the below code in constructor to initialize all properties in the class, but, can we do the same in C#? public class Test { public String Name {get; set;} public int Age {get; set;} public Test() { //Initialize all properties } } Edit: Is this the correct way of creating a constructor? A: If the properties are default-implemented and you're not storing them in some backing field in your class, you don't need to initialize them at all; you're not storing or accessing any instance state. In which case, the constructor is the perfect place for initializing them. A: The exact same way; public class Test { public String Name {get; set;} public int Age {get; set;} public Test() { this.Name = "bla"; this.Age = 12; } } 09e8f5149f
