I had a lovely accident a few weeks ago. A cardboard box filled with £100 of brand new PC parts collapsed on top of me. You can imagine my gratitude to its owner. Box cracked through in half, with hole in side Having literally run my fingers through the laptop case in the box, looking for anything not quite right, the most obviously broken component was the screen. I thought, it must be some kind of protective film covering it. In addition to the whole screen being covered in that protective film, a lot of the edges had chipped off and the edge was showing through. I couldn't even begin to think that a replacement screen was going to be cheap enough. But then I found it. Just a tiny bit of black plastic covering a tiny chip. Also in the box was a Samsung PS3 S-RAM chip and a power adapter. It seemed to have been reasonably well stored, but I figured it was broken when it was packed. When I unpacked it I could see it still worked. The Sony RAM chip is around 2.5GB. I decided to use it as a simple USB3 storage drive. I used the onboard USB3 ports on the motherboard and the SATA slots. That meant I could use it as a simple USB drive to copy over files if the computer wouldn't start. The Samsung PS3 S-RAM chip is 81e310abbf
