Adjustment Optimizer is a useful tool designed to adjust a variety of Windows Explorer settings and increase performance for everyday use. This utility is not an overhaul of Microsoft's Windows Explorer, but it does employ an innovative new setting on the user's profile which can make it much faster, while also increasing the efficiency of the operation. The new setting is called "Filter Folders", where you can set how much time you want to spend sifting through documents and folders when you open them, as well as whether or not to disable the "View in File Manager" option altogether. The latter is particularly useful if you often forget to open documents or folders via the "File Manager" and then have to wait for windows to load. Adjustment Optimizer Options 1. Filter Folders: Specifies how much time Windows Explorer should spend on the task of opening and sorting files

May 4, 2019 NPR News More than 20,000 Americans suffer a stroke each day, and the No. 1 risk factor is age. So while many people don't like to think about their age, it's impossible not to think about it when a stroke strikes. A new study from the Cleveland Clinic suggests that adults 40 and younger are at an increased risk for death after a stroke compared with people 50 and older. Robert McGinn, who led the study, says the findings are a call to action for younger stroke patients and their doctors. "You see a patient come in with a stroke and it's largely their first stroke. And you tell them, 'Well, we're going to do a thing for you,' and a couple weeks later, they're dead," says McGinn. "And for a lot of people, that's the end of their experience of stroke." The study,
