The conversion of insulin from alpha to beta conformation is most efficient upon complexation with other proteins or in the presence of low concentrations of guanidine hydrochloride. Prolonged incubation of insulin at neutral pH produces a transition from the alpha to beta conformations on the length scale of the protein. We have carried out a molecular dynamics simulation to study the transition of the bundle of the protein. The result shows that the formation of beta-staple in the process of complexation is responsible for the transition of insulin from alpha to beta conformations. The transition is about 10 angstroms long and nucleates at the middle of the protein. The early stage of the transition in which the formation of beta-staple is the dominant conformation can be described by a 2-dimensional diffusion process. Albert J.
