The impact of the fluoridated water supply on antimicrobial resistance in Streptococcus pneumoniae in an Australian context. Fluoride is a naturally occurring element in the environment and has been widely used in dentistry as a preventive and therapeutic measure. In Australia, water fluoridation was established to control dental caries. Other potential benefits to public health include reduction of dental caries, reduction of the incidence of certain cancers and, more recently, improved dentition. In Australia, dental health and water fluoridation are strong contributors to the reduced burden of dental caries and the health benefits resulting from these programs have lead to the establishment of dental clinics in remote areas. One possible consequence of these programs is the inclusion of antimicrobial agents such as penicillin in the dental treatment of children. A study of S. pneumoniae strains isolated during 1974-1976 from five remote rural communities in the far west of Western Australia shows that the overall rate of resistance to penicillin was 2.4%, while resistance to erythromycin was at 28.2%. The isolated bacterial strains were tested for penicillin and erythromycin resistance by disc diffusion.

The impact of water fluoridation in the remote community of Jemoong located 350 km south west of Broome, Western Australia during the study period, was also investigated. The results demonstrate that children drinking water with a fluoride level of 0.7 ppm prior to the age of 3 years developed an innate resistance to penicillin which was reflected in their later developing an increased level of penicillin resistance. A possible explanation for this phenomenon is that the innate resistance in the child affects the subsequent immune response of the host which in turn affects the subsequent development of acquired resistance against penicillin. Competitive Intelligence Text-based analysis helps to identify what is happening within an organisation, and will help identify potential weak spots that need to be built upon. In the past, CIS organizations have been successful by working with their competitors in an organic way – looking to see what they are doing, watching their intelligence services, and where they are most successful and the areas where they are weakest. Like any business, companies that compete for your business have an increased need to protect their information assets. The reason for this is that you are under the threat of an attack, someone attempting to identify your weaknesses, or to intercept information being transmitted, that could ultimately put your business at risk. If an organisation is focused on assisting your business in a security operation
