As a result of such studies, many of these models have been implemented in order to estimate the future performance of a network. However, the lack of a formal definition for traffic flow on a given network makes it difficult to develop more sophisticated models. In response to this challenge, the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF) has been working on the "Resource ReSerVation Protocol (RSVP)" for use in conjunction with the Internet Protocol (IP). (Refer to RFCs 2205, 2269, and 2274.) RSVP is a framework for establishing and managing resource reservation on a packet network, which may be used to establish different types of quality of service (QoS) parameters. When used in conjunction with IP, RSVP can be used to reserve resources on a packet-by-packet basis. RSVP, however, has several drawbacks. One problem with RSVP is that it is a complex protocol, which makes it difficult for all-IP networks to utilize it. Another problem is that RSVP is a relatively new protocol, and as a result, the current protocol is not fully deployed. As a result of the lack of widespread deployment of RSVP, a number of different protocols and other models have been developed. One such model that has been developed is the "Multiprotocol Label Switching (MPLS) Traffic Engineering (TE) label switched path (LSP)" model. (Refer to RFCs 3036 and 3065.) With MPLS TE, a label switched path (LSP) is established from an ingress label switched node (LSN) to an egress LSN. The LSP is assigned a specific TE label that uniquely identifies the LSP to a particular egress LSN, and once an LSP is established, it may be utilized to carry traffic from an ingress LSN to the egress L
