If you just want to see how to download a file from Yahoo then you can simply refer to this posting. It is similar to clicking on the 'download' link on a Yahoo page. In this posting I have explained the steps for downloading a file from Google. The steps are similar to those for Yahoo. In this posting I have also explained the steps for downloading a file from Google in the browser and also from the command line. When you are downloading a file from Yahoo or Google then you will normally end up with a file named .ext. In this posting I have explained that it is sometimes difficult to identify the basename of the file. There are several possible reasons for this. A file can have the extension.ext or .ext added to the end of the filename. A file can have one of the variants.nfo.nxt,.nfo or.nxx added to the end of the filename. I have illustrated how to download a file from the Google web interface by using the 'save as' feature. I have also explained that you can use the drag-and-drop feature of the Google interface to move a file from the browser to a more suitable location. I have also explained how to drag the file to a new location using the command line. As we have already seen in the past from Yahoo and Google, the download links often do not include the extension and the basename. Hence you might find that the browser'save as' dialog does not provide a filename for the file. However there is a solution. This problem can be overcome by using the 'add missing filename' option in the dialog. You could also instruct the browser to display the basename by using the 'preview as' option. There are several extensions to identify the basename or file name of a file. The popular ones include: .nfo .n 09e8f5149f
