For example if the G7 says that it is important to maintain social cohesion we have to ask what that even means and why we should care about it. This is the nature of the G7: you announce what you want to do, you don't really discuss what it means, and of course it is absolutely unknown if you will be successful. If you think about it the G7 is nothing more than the old men of the world trying to lay their hands on the money of the rest of the world. They cannot afford to give anything to the rest of the world and what they do not have is still worth more than what they do. This is why the G7 is a big failure in my book. (For more on the G7 you can look up the G20. The G20 is exactly the same thing with a bit more weight. The G20 is a meeting of the members of the IMF, the BIS, the World Bank and the ECB. They are supposed to help to create better transparency in the global financial system and they have every bit of importance the G7 has. This will not

What's New in the Snowing?

Snowy is a theme for Windows, bringing back the memories of snowy winter and snowy nights. Q: I would like to read and write to the same line in C Let's say I would like to have a string stored in memory. In C, I need to specify a pointer, in which I put all the strings. After that, I must add the strings to the memory. For example, if my pointer is named a and my string is hello. This is what I would do: #include int main(void) { char* a = "hello"; printf("%s", a); } Here is what I would like to do: #include int main(void) { char* a = "hello"; printf("%s", a); printf("%s", a); } The output of the program is: hello hello I would like to read the same line (the last string) from my pointer a. How can I do this in C? A: The C Standard allows that, as long as you do not modify the object after having read from it (and you should keep reading until the end of the object). So, you can: #include int main(void) { char* a = "hello"; printf("%s", a); printf("%s", a); } If you want to actually print the same string, the trick is to assign the pointers to the same string: #include int main(void) { char* a = "hello"; char* b = "hello"; printf("%s", a); printf("%s", b); } If you are in a situation where you cannot do this, the standard contains an example in the explanation of strdup: char *strdup(const char *s) { size_t n = strlen(s) + 1; char *d = malloc(n); if (!d) return NULL; memcpy(d, s, n); return d; } If this is not possible, you can use libraries such as the GNU readline library to emulate such a feature. A: C99 introduces std::string: #include #include
