The European Union has published its draft position in response to the United Kingdom's request for a delay to Brexit. The proposal from the European Commission proposes a deal that would provide legal assurances to the British government. It proposes a one-year "flextension" of the Article 50 negotiating period to 30 June 2020, or even a further year to 31 January 2021. The EU executive proposal will be discussed by EU leaders later on Wednesday. Meanwhile, the British government will present the draft withdrawal agreement to the European Parliament tomorrow, and will set out its position to the relevant EU institutions in the coming days. The UK government and its EU counterparts have been locked in a stand-off in the last three weeks, as Prime Minister Theresa May is under increasing pressure from EU leaders to drop her Chequers proposals and is considering a deal based on World Trade Organization rules. READ MORE: Brexit talks - the background In an interview with Sky News, Brexit Secretary Dominic Raab said the EU draft offers a "crucial" outline of the issues that must be resolved. Raab reiterated that the Irish backstop is the "glue" that binds the withdrawal agreement together. "The proposition that I laid out to my colleagues this morning was to come back to the European Union - to open a new phase of negotiation - where we can work together to negotiate on those things that are of mutual interest: on trade, which for the UK is very big. On aviation, on security cooperation, on science," Raab told Sky News, "It will give us the chance to negotiate a future relationship, and to that end we want to engage with the European Union on a positive way, not on a negative way," he said. "We want to engage on future arrangements that are mutually beneficial, not mutually destructive." When asked if he will listen to the voices of MPs who want to see a no-deal exit on March 29, Raab said: "We'll have to listen to their advice. We'll also listen to parliament's advice." He added: "We're in a party political election in the UK, a general election in the United States, and the EU doesn't want to, in some respects, play into the party politics of this." May has promised the "firmest
