Steve Jobs Launches Twitter-Like Microblogging Social Network For the past five years, Steve Jobs has kept quiet about the future of Apple. But it seems like the time has come, and we will have the first glimpse of what the Jobs-led company is cooking in the tech world, as they are rumored to be launching a social networking website called Twitter-like microblogging service. According to recent reports, the company has reportedly been developing the new service as a social networking microblogging site called Twitter. According to the report, a few leaked screenshots of the upcoming Twitter-like service have already hit the Web, as the new Twitter will only allow users to share 140 characters long messages. The new Twitter will be similar to current Twitter client TweetDeck, which will allow users to post 140 characters long messages to Twitter and also import content from other services, such as Facebook, MySpace and Digg. According to the report, the new microblogging service will also feature a user profile page with details such as username, date of birth, and last seen on the service. The new Twitter will also allow users to have accounts or log in with their Facebook IDs, in addition to working with phone numbers, email addresses and contacts. However, there's no word yet when the new service will be launched, but it has been speculated that the new service will be released at Apple's iPad 2 event which is scheduled for Tuesday, Jan. 27.Q: How to disable spell check while writing a letter?
