An accused burglar who lost his freedom following a three-year prison sentence over a drunken night out has been told he won't get any compensation for being wrongly convicted. Christopher Penn was given a suspended sentence in 2012 for stealing an £80 torch from his home in Telford. He was cleared a year later, after a successful appeal, but he was re-arrested in 2017 and pleaded guilty to the same offence. Under the terms of his suspended sentence he was ordered to spend three years in prison, and three years on licence, and he had been given 190 hours of unpaid work. Now the Court of Appeal has dismissed his claim that he was wrongly convicted and sent to prison. In doing so, it has not only refused to compensate him, but insisted that it would be "quite inappropriate" to award him compensation for the breach of his licence. The Home Office told the court that Penn was a "serial offender", who had received "a very significant punishment" for his "genuine conviction for an offence to which he had pled guilty". In a reference to a successful appeal against a similar conviction in 2009, the judges said: "While the degree of this appellant's offence and its triviality compared with some others we have considered, we do not wish to denigrate the degree of appellant's conviction or the sentence that was passed." Related stories Penn is one of around 30,000 people in England and Wales who have had their convictions overturned as a result of a successful appeal against a magistrates' court or
