This marked the beginning of the modern CAD revolution, as a CAD operator no longer needed to sit at a terminal, but could take their work with them. This was followed up with the release of AutoCAD, in December of that year. AutoCAD is primarily an architectural program, but it has capabilities in many other fields as well. The group, the People's Liberation Army Unit 61398, also known as the Comment Group, is believed to be working on behalf of the Chinese government and has been accused of stealing and selling data from a number of US and European companies. According to Reuters, the group has targeted over 500 companies, including aerospace manufacturer Airbus and German carmaker Daimler. More recently, it has targeted engineering firm Rolls Royce, in an apparent attempt to steal technology in a separate attack. Affected companies have included Airbus, Rolls Royce, Daimler and energy company Eni. At the centre of the accusations is that the attackers have used the technique of SQL injection to gain access to systems. SQL injection attacks work by manipulating the searchable information inside a database, usually by inserting code into a website where a person would normally type in an address to search for something. At this point the attacker is able to bypass standard security measures by inserting an SQL command to the server, which allows them to alter data in the system. This attack technique is believed to have been used by the group in attacks on Rolls Royce and Eni. The group has also stolen data from Airbus' supplier, a company called CFM International. In a statement provided to Reuters, Daimler said that some data had been stolen, but that it hadn't been impacted by the attacks. Rolls Royce said it had not been impacted either. As well as targeting technology companies, the group has been accused of stealing intellectual property and business information. Reuters reports that the attacks began in August, but only became known in December. It's believed the group is still active. Unlike traditional hacking operations, the tactics used by this group have enabled them to retain their
