A case of proliferation of pancreatic islets (pseudotumoral) is studied by histochemical techniques for neutral and acid lipids, glycogen and glycoconjugates, and by immunohistochemical reactions to pancreatic secretory granules and insulin. The diagnosis was confirmed by electron microscopy, which showed a number of typical features of protein-rich islets. The histochemical results are discussed: (1) The neutral lipid content is of variable proportion (from 25-70%), exhibiting no difference when the biochemical and histochemical tests are compared (normoglycaemic or hypoglycaemic). (2) Glycogen content is reduced in all islets, the significance of this abnormal phenomenon is discussed. (3) The acid and neutral glycoconjugates are expressed similarly in different islet cells, the expression of the latter in the secretory granules appearing deficient. (4) Secretory granules are fewer and smaller than those in normal islets. The above results point to a definite impairment of insulin secretion. The authors distinguish two kinds of islet cells: insulin-secreting and non-insulin producing. The latter are normal in structure but show a lack of functional granules; they are metabolically and histochemically normal.Improved personal outcome and quality of life after aggressive resection for advanced rectal cancer. In developed countries, the diagnosis of advanced rectal cancer occurs in increasingly elderly patients with other concomitant diseases. This study aimed to determine the potential benefit of a less invasive operation in a selected group of patients with locally advanced rectal cancer. Between 2003 and 2009, 29 consecutive patients with locally advanced rectal cancer were operated on without a conventional abdominoperineal resection (APR) and lower stoma creation.
