The present invention relates generally to virtualization management for a computer, and more particularly to a method and system for monitoring, recording and reacting to virtualization events affecting an isolated storage area in the computer. In a virtualization environment, one or more systems, such as physical servers, are constructed of one or more virtual machines. Each virtual machine implements or supports one or more applications and/or one or more services. A hypervisor, or operating system, in the virtual machine can execute one or more operating systems concurrently, or execute the same operating system on one or more virtual machines concurrently. Each virtual machine is a software implementation of a physical machine. A virtual machine may include the same hardware components as a physical machine, but is considered a separate entity from the physical machine. Similarly, a virtual machine may include additional hardware components, such as virtualized components of a physical server, which may not be present in the physical server in a physical machine. Further, one or more virtual machines can share the same physical server, in which case the virtual machines are also considered to be separate entities. Virtualization allows one or more virtual machines to execute on a single physical machine. If the virtualization is performed for operating system environments, one or more virtual machines executing the same operating system may be active or inactive concurrently, such that if one virtual machine has an operating system error, the other virtual machines will not be affected by the error. Further, a virtual machine can be considered to be an application or service that is executing on another virtual machine, such that each virtual machine may concurrently execute multiple applications or services. Performance of the virtual machine is monitored to ensure that one or more virtual machines are meeting performance expectations. For example, the performance of a virtual machine may be monitored in order to ensure that the performance expectations of one or more applications executing in the virtual machine are being met. One example
