When I type "America" using a computer keyboard, the capital A is printed. When I write it in handwriting, it is printed as "Amerca". Why the discrepancy? Shouldn't all the letters be capitalized in the word "America"? A: The reason is very simple: English has a non-temporal, native system of capitalization. If you don't understand that, look it up in a dictionary. It's a history thing. Early English did not have a temporal system of capitalization in the way we have today. Not all fonts capitalized the first letter of every word, not all texts capitalized the first letters of headings and subheadings, not all authors capitalized the first letters of the chapters of a book. When you wanted to express "the Capital" or "A Capital Letter", you would start the next word with a capital letter. Some of the earlier texts didn't use a temporal system at all: they capitalized all of the letters, or none of them. The problem with that, though, is that the "rules" at that point weren't so clear. Should you capitalize the "T" in "Temporal"? If not, then how about the "L", the "H", the "M", and the "T"? In the early medieval, early modern, and modern eras, "America" was capitalized in English text, because most people used the temporal system. The problem is, "America" is not a word, it's a hyphenated compound (a periphrastic or derivative noun) that creates a new one. The temporal system of capitalization doesn't apply to a hyphenated
