Constructed wetlands are known to be suitable for the storage of stormwater runoff, both as a way of increasing the quality of the water and as a way of decreasing the volume that needs to be disposed of to streams and the environment. In this paper, the sludge produced in a facultative swale unit is used as a fill material in a tertiary treatment constructed wetland. The aquifer fills with water and it is assumed that the wastewater solids are retained in the storage unit. The unit design is compared with a semi-closed design with surface flow. At the steady state the difference is that the flow in the unit is mainly biodegraded rather than cleared by surface flow. The long-term operation of the unit also indicated that the levels of dissolved organic carbon in the treated water of the unit may have been increased as the pollutants present in the wastewater were more efficiently removed. The cost of storage and hydraulic transport for sewage for the two designs have been estimated. It is concluded that the storage unit is a good way of treating stormwater runoff which is not at present used. The main

TechA newborn baby, still inside the womb, was born with a 6-inch long appendix -- the longest ever found in a live birth. The mid-section appendage was discovered at a private clinic in the southern Brazil city of Canoas along with the baby's other organs. The baby's appendix was empty, and the rest of its organs were functioning normally, the doctors said. The 18-inch-long body part is half as long as an adult or other large apes' appendix. Normal appendices are 1 to 3 inches long. Doctors and the mother said there is no reason to question the size of the baby's normal organs, according to a report published Thursday in the scientific journal, Pediatric Research. "It is just the appendix of an adolescent in the body of a newborn baby," study author Dr. Igor Rojas, a gynaecologist at the Federal University of Santa Catarina, told CNN. "A body built by a mother, and it wasn't the biggest baby that I've seen in my career. The biggest ones I have seen were about two months, three months or a year old." The baby's father is a seven-year-old boy whose appendix was removed in infancy because of a condition called hemophilia, an American Journal report said. The baby's condition, called gigantism, is caused by a hormone imbalance, stemming from genetic factors in the mother or father, but it is unclear whether the mother's appendix was enlarged as a result. At sogeti's progression benchmarking conference, I attended a presentation by (and spoke to) Margo Seltzer from leadership consultancy Talent Matters.
