That motion capture data is used to fine-tune player stamina and to create faster-than-real-time reactions, such as a player dribbling the ball in mid-air or dribbling it while in mid-jump. It also helps take the load off the CPU, as artificial intelligence (AI) can be programmed to react to all player actions instantly. "Our technology is designed to simulate the player's entire body and all interactions with the ball," senior engineer Arnout van den Berg, who oversaw this project for EA Sports, tells Game Informer. "Our goal was to remove the artificial intelligence from the game and make it so that players don't have to move around," he continues, "so that the player no longer has to plan and calculate his movements, but that they can be intelligent." Higher-fidelity animations will help make this happen, such as the movement of the legs, hips, and feet while dribbling, tucking, or making sure that the player stays balanced while pressing a button or kicking. Take a look at the sequence below, for example, that shows a player following a ball while making more than one successful pass. Look at how the player's upper body and joints follow the movement of the ball, and how smoothly the player can adjust his balance to make the second pass. "The player's true movements are [so complex] that you really need to have a high-fidelity simulation to do that," says van den Berg. "So the team trained with us for four hours to make sure that our technology could work with that high-fidelity simulation. We used their data, but we made sure that our technology could handle all the calculations." During this training, EA Sports' motion capture team was also trying to make sure the player's movements felt right. "The first thing [the player should be able to do] is to jump," says van den Berg. "It's the most important thing to make sure that you can control the jump, whether it's a real-life player or a virtual player." An important thing to make sure a jump feels right is precisely controlling the jump height and rotation. "We had to make sure that the player could jump with a certain height, that it feels
