The diploid outcrossing model plant Arabidopsis thaliana is an excellent system for elucidating many aspects of pollination and fertilization. Further, Arabidopsis is the most commonly studied plant in which to investigate mutualism with insects. This is due to the large number of genetic tools available, and the fact that arthropods of this genus are particularly suited for pollination studies, owing to their excellent system for spatial and temporal selfing. In particular, self-pollination frequently gives rise to enormous increases in seed mass and can lead to dramatic increases in genetic diversity. This combination of traits in Arabidopsis has been used in several investigations into the effects of pollen tube growth and/or self-fertilization on the timing of female gametophyte maturation, and more recently in investigations into the effects of these factors on the integrity of the
