But on Capitol Hill, at least, it's a subject that scarcely registers. To most lawmakers, the league is a flashpoint for political debate about what has been called "excessive" employee benefits, which, in the context of football, can be compared to the annual $1.2 million retirement plan awarded to the league's senior executives. The league has for decades given players exclusive and in many cases laughable benefits that take on the character of a second social-security system for players; but even some of the league's staunchest defenders admit that the NFL can do more to protect and nurture players. And that the uproar that followed the release of the league's "Deflategate" report in late January is itself a case study in the NFL's reach and consequences. The Brady-Manning squabble, so gripping and public, has grabbed the attention of both the league and its fans, and has resulted in the first congressional oversight hearing into the league's operations in nearly a quarter-century. It is just one of a growing list of questions about the league and its rules, finances, and, more broadly, its connection with society. How can an institution that spends $8 billion a year—slightly more than the entire annual budget of the next 12 largest economies in the world combined, according to the Wall Street Journal—and employs more than 45,000 people, be held accountable for social and environmental concerns? In Washington

But when the reality show The Voice crowns America's favorite on Tuesday night (May 16), former L.A. Lakers star LeBron James — and wife Savannah's, Makayla Epps, decision to say yes — might turn out to be a key contributor to her professional success. According to ET Online, the courtship began in 2013. Savannah, an aspiring model, was already a professional dancer when she first spotted the former Cavs player at an up-and-coming rap artist's show. "The first time I met him was in 2013, when I was

16,” the 25-year-old recalls. “He was a contestant on a show called ABC’s ‘Dancing with the Stars’ and it was his first time in a dance competition, but he made it all the way to the finals and he won.” After the show aired, LeBron invited Savannah out to dinner, after which the two-time NBA champ dropped hints that he was interested in having a romantic relationship. Over time, LeBron made it clear he wanted more than just a one-night stand, and Savannah began to dig through her closet to find dresses to impress her sports superstar. “I was uncomfortable because I felt like
