Layers The first step to working in the Adobe Photoshop tool is to make a _layer_ (refer to Figure 6-1). Layers are a way to control the order in which you work on an image. Each layer has a unique background color—usually black—and you can paint on the layers that act as pencils (the white in the figure) so that you can make an image appear how you want it to appear. When you're done, you can merge one or more layers into a single composite image. You can create additional layers by using the _Layer menu,_ as shown in Figure 6-2. The menu has four items, and these functions change depending on which of the four items you select: * New Layer: Creates a new layer in the current document and opens the Layers panel at the bottom of the Photoshop screen. * Add Layer: Enables you to create a layer by clicking the Add Layer button in the Layers panel. * Edit Layer: Opens the Layers panel. * Merge Down: Reduces the current layer's opacity. People often think they are their best friend, an illusion which sometimes, thanks to those last eight number plate magnets, can be hard to shake off… Today, I met a woman called Carrie. Carrie took me to her home, where she showed me her favorite mug, her favorite picture of her two children, a vintage mobile phone, a vintage camera and other pieces of her life. That's pretty much what a person does when they meet me, too. They usually show me something of themselves. Whether it be a photo, an object, or a gift, it's clear we all want to show something of ourselves to you. This doesn't mean we're hiding something. We're not scared of showing you parts of ourselves. We're just comfortable telling the world who we really are. So, if you've met someone in your life and they've shared something about themselves, it's because that something was important to them. If something can't be shared, it's because that something is precious to them. Because it isn't out of the ordinary for them. Because it can't be shared with the world, it's a piece of themselves that can't be shared with others. How can we get to know one another without people sharing something of themselves with us? If you're shy, or don't like people getting to know you, that's understandable. But ultimately, if you are a good friend to someone, you've got to get to know them. That means the person can't just be a friend. They must be a friend that we're interested in who's interesting enough to talk to. If we're going to be interesting, we're going to have to be a bit of a public person. This is our common humanity. This is the way we share ourselves with each other. Our tattoos, our stories, our smiles, our ambitions, our potential, our past, our defeats, our failures – we all share these things. We all share our hearts. And when we do share, we share the things we care about. Things that make us happy, when we're sad, when we're angry. So
