This invention relates to apparatus for treating material with low pressure mercury lamp discharge, for example, processing semiconductor wafers by exposing them to ultraviolet (UV) light within the mercury spectral range of 254-365 nanometers (nm). It has been found that the wafers can be processed more uniformly by using the UV light from such lamps to effect curing of photoresist, and also to be exposed to both a moderate amount and a high amount of UV to control the post-exposure bake (PEB) time. The size of a wafer or the size of any object to be irradiated by mercury lamps is normally limited by the size of the light emitter or light sources, such as a mercury arc tube, which limits the size of the object that can be treated, and the size of the light source limits the total power of lamp energy that can be transmitted to the wafer. Thus, there has been a need for a compact lamp to overcome these limitations. One type of compact lamp used with mercury discharge devices is referred to as an ultraviolet-deep ultraviolet (UV-DUV) lamp. The standard DUV lamps have an arc tube diameter of about three centimeters (cm) and a power of about 30-50 watts (W). U.S. Pat. No. 4,877,021 shows an exemplary mercury lamp having a high energy discharge in which the electrodes are disposed on opposite sides of a hollow arc tube and spaced within the arc tube. The discharge produces an emission in the mercury spectral range of 254-365 nm. Melatonin in the treatment of major depression and “I am very hard to find for when I am lost,” said the old man. “I can solve all sorts of problems for any one who will listen to me.” You sit astride the old man’s back in his small kingdom, a dark velvet cape matching your black robes. The old man ferries you from place to place, on a journey to gather a collection of the most evil of sinners. But first, you would like his advice. “Yours is a terrific cape. What do you call it?” “Death Robes,” the old man answered. “No, the other thing.” “The Death Robes.” “So what is it?” “I thought everyone knew that it was called a Death Cape.” “No, it’s called a Death Robe.” “I call it a Death Cape,” the old man shouted suddenly. “God, very well then. I do not understand why all the elves over there are holding you up.” The old man holds his hand over your mouth and stands on a long platform as his heels touch the ground. He glides to one side as you run, jumping off the ground and into the old man’s hand. Your cloak falls open, revealing a black robe. “I love this cape. It’s very comfortable,” he says, and runs down the stairs, jumping down the towers of a fortress. You disembark the old man, running ahead to a side of the castle. Your cloak falls open, revealing a black cape. You miss the vague figure of a man as you run past, and tumble to the ground. A guard runs into the open space, and you silently crawl over to the stables. In the stable, you find a bucket of blood with a goblet in it. The bucket rattles slightly as a voice comes from the stables. “Every day, the five lowest peasants in town are pushed into the rapids of the river. They are to be forced into the water and drown. Anybody who wishes to watch becomes high paid. Work
