Endotoxin, the cell wall component of gram-negative bacteria, stimulates the release of cytokines and the production of inflammatory mediators by macrophages. Among these mediators, the proinflammatory lipid metabolites synthesized from arachidonic acid through the cytochrome P-450 pathway and their main cellular source is the inducible 8-lipoxygenase (8-LOX) enzyme. Pharmacological targeting of the 8-LOX pathway may provide a novel approach to treat systemic inflammatory response syndrome (SIRS), a clinical syndrome with a high mortality rate, presumably due to increased cytokine production and persistent inflammation. Systemic injection of LPS in rodents induced a SIRS with similar features to human SIRS. Using this model, we observed a rapid up-regulation in the enzyme activity of 8-LOX, in the expression of the mRNA encoding for this enzyme, and in the levels of the lipid inflammatory mediators 12-epi-LTD2 and LTB4. This increase was parallel to that found in the plasma levels of the cytokines TNF-alpha, IL-1beta, and IL-6. The administration of a selective 8-LOX inhibitor (LY354740) or of an inhibitor of the 5-lipoxygenase/leukotriene pathway (MK886) or of a caspase inhibitor (z-VAD.fmk) was able to markedly reduce LPS-induced systemic IL-1beta and IL-6 up-regulation. Our results demonstrate, for
