Field of the Invention This invention relates to a solid state laser device and, more particularly, to a solid state laser device which can be efficiently excited by a high power laser light. 2. Description of the Prior Art Conventionally, metal-semiconductor devices made of, for example, gallium-arsenic semiconductor (GaAs) and gallium phosphide (GaP) have been widely used for the production of a solid state laser device. The devices generally have the form of a chip having an active region on a surface thereof and a semiconductor layer opposite to the active region in which electrodes are formed. The active region and semiconductor layer are laser driven by supplying a current from an external power source through the electrodes. In the above conventional solid state laser device, however, the semiconductor layer which is opposite to the active region is used as a laser confining structure, and therefore it is impossible to efficiently confine laser light into the active region. It is known that the larger the ratio between the length of the active region and that of the laser confining layer, the more efficient the confinement of laser light into the active region. Furthermore, the higher the transmittance of the semiconductor layer, the more efficient the confinement of laser light. As a result, it is necessary to increase the transmittance of the semiconductor layer in order to increase the ratio between the length of the active region and that of the laser confining layer, and further to increase the power output. e79caf774b
