Q: Where are Ajax requests routed in hybrid applications? When developing hybrid apps in Meteor, I noticed that there is a request level logging system that indicates the document location or other info about each request coming from the client to the server. When developing hybrid apps in Cordova I have noticed that almost all requests are routed through a Cordova/PhoneGap API instead of directly sending the request from the client to the server. It would be nice to know which system is the one used in hybrid applications and whether it is possible to change it on the client side.

A: It is handled by your mobile browser. When calling an url from your code from your mobile browser to your server you will call the url through the phonegap API to your server. For example, when you open a facebook profile from your application (or any other url) you have to open the url in the phonegap API, and the function will be called by your code. However, when you call an url from the server back to your mobile browser (for example, a route to a js file) the request will be handled directly by your browser, and you have to work with the same requirements as to write a web page. Also, by the same way, the same "middleware" can be used by your code to call requests directly to your server by calling url from code, and it can be used to call to url from the browser, so there are no limitations about that.

Q: How to know which enum was clicked in Java? In my program I want to know if it's possible to check which enum was clicked in Java? For example, I have the following enum: public enum
