Five Democratic presidential candidates clashed in their final debate on Thursday over one of the most critical debates of the primary season: Their positions on health care. The candidates, on a single stage for the third debate, had until then largely avoided criticizing one another on the hot-button issue, an approach designed to avoid a repeat of a fiery, early debate in June where several candidates attacked each other's health care plans. But a boisterous back-and-forth over topics like "Medicare for All" and border walls was the main event as the Democratic primary hits a brick wall with three weeks left before the Iowa caucuses. Former Vice President Joseph R. Biden, who is mostly self-funding his campaign, pressed forward on health care even after a heart attack in December kept him out of the race for more than a month. He was joined onstage by the leading front-runners, Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and former South Bend, Ind., Mayor Pete Buttigieg, who has softened his opposition to the "Medicare for All" bill backed by Ms. Warren and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont. Mr. Buttigieg, who sees himself as the candidate most able to unify the party, said the American people "deserve better than the dysfunctional failure that is the Republican health care system." The PDA's, usually the palm-sized Jornada, and a Motorola Q9xx, are clamshell communication devices that allow a user to make both voice and text telephone calls from inside the device, and to be able to synchronize the calendar, address book and other data on the PDA with the master data on the PDA's host computer. The use of this particular type of data synchronization device, called a synchronizing agent, can take a significant amount of time to make a full synchronization between the host and the agent. The reason for this is that when the host
