Tab The USP of the Software Synthesizer is the Sound but as you may know it is a combination of hardware and software. I was wondering what you would think of VArranger (Varranger2) is and if it is similar to the Synth you have been using? The main problem that I have with using a Software Synth is that I can't live with it if I am bored, I can still practice on the same sounds. With a real synthesizer I can shut it off and just when I get tired of the sound tweak it up, play and tweak it some more, I can do that as much as I want and if I get bored of it I can go to something else. This is not the case with a Software Synthesizer. So is Varranger2 similar to a real "Baby" Synth? If not could you please explain what I am missing about how it "IS" similar to the type of synth that I am used to?. A: The biggest difference is the interface. There's no knobs and faders for you to control, because the sounds and parameters are already designed in the software (though you can tweak them a little with the trim pots/pots). That means that you can get a song or a section of a song, make it sound perfect, and then when the song is finished, you can play another part of the same song without changing anything. That means you can have two sections of a song in a row that sound exactly the same - no fudging it up. It doesn't sound like you would be able to do that with a synth. But the quality of the synth sounds is completely different. The software sounds are very 'twee' and the way they behave is that they always sound the same. One of the things that makes a synth so fun to use is that you can stop and start it, change its parameters, and even tweak it - all that without having to restart it. If you're going to use a software synthesizer, I'd suggest getting a better one. I like the VST Synth Editor - it's not a fully featured synth, but it's free, and that's good enough for me. If you're going to use the Varranger, you'll need to get a sequencer or sampler. I think the Ardour Sequencer is the best option for now (I'd suggest the Ard
