We demonstrate the sensitivity of segmental anisotropy measures to a priori information about fibre angle dispersion in a rat model that does not have optic nerve degeneration, which has been shown to alter the complexity of the angular spread of fibre directions [b045]-[b049]. In this study, we have confirmed that the MWF anisotropy profiles produced in our rat brain map are sensitive to in vivo alterations in the distribution of fibre angles (Fig. 4)(#fig04){ref-type="fig"}). The profile of MWF anisotropy in the arcuate bundle, for example, is a sensitive indicator of the spatial pattern of directional dispersal of fibre directions (Fig. 4)(#fig04){ref-type="fig"}). The dispersion profile obtained here is similar to that in our previous in vivo DTI [b016] and tractography [b015] studies on the rat optic nerve, as well as in ex vivo studies on human optic nerves [b045]. The rat arcuate and mammillothalamic bundles, which are correspondences of human splenium [b022], [b045]. In both the rat and human, these bundles are known to contain angle-dependent dispersion patterns that are distinct from the other components of the fibre tracts [b046], [b047], [b049]. Our data indicate that the spatial and angular patterns of segmental anisotropy, as revealed by the MWF anisotropy profile, remain relatively invariant with advancing age and demonstrate little degradation even in animals over 7 months old. In fact, the magnitudes of the anisotropy profiles (Fig. 4)(#fig04){ref-type="fig"} were similar in P42 (postnatal day 42)
