Immune mediated anaphylaxis may produce marked respiratory compromise, often with acute airway obstruction, due to excessive cough, bronchospasm, or both. Hyperamylasemia may be accompanied by a symmetric or asymmetric breathlessness, especially on exertion. Hyperamylasemia is generally transient, resolving over 24-48 hours. We describe two patients in whom clonidine 0.2 mg IV decreased hyperamylasemia. Both patients had previously suffered an episode of anaphylaxis for which other symptomatic treatments had failed. Amylase was measured daily in one patient while on clonidine and had values less than 8 times the normal range for all days. Serum IgE levels had been less than 20 IU/mL in both patients. The normal range for amylase was 40-130 U/L. In one patient, amylase levels normalized within 24 hours and the need for supplemental oxygen was eliminated. In the other patient, amylase levels returned to normal within 48 hours and was discontinued. Clonidine may temporarily reverse hyperamylasemia due to anaphylaxis. Our patients' partial response to clonidine suggests that the peak IgE concentration may be a more sensitive predictor of response than the total serum IgE concentration. If a patient's amylase elevates abnormally and persists despite treatment for anaphylaxis, clonidine may be a useful adjunct.³⁹: 648931e174
