Northern Ireland In 1912, a year before the First World War, the Ulster Liberal Unionist MP, John Redmond, shocked the House of Commons with the news that he intended to stand in the UK election that year. In a country still simmering from the death of the Titanic, with the Boer War raging in the South African colonies, and with an atmosphere of a suicidally tense Home Rule crisis, the small northern party which had created, for its principles, the inchoate Irish Parliamentary Party, was a minority in the House of Commons. It was able to raise little support elsewhere, and it simply did not have the votes to form a government. Redmond's later attempts to form a coalition with the Labour Party were, in 1916, even more doomed. But on the first day of the General Election, he succeeded in winning the support of some of the Conservative and Liberal Unionist Unionists, and, as they did not have enough Unionist MPs to form a majority government on their own, he became prime minister. It was, in effect, a form of fudge, and the Ulster Unionist Party, as a party, did not exist. This caused a great deal of disruption. As a nation within a nation, Ulster was not to become part of the UK. The parishes in Northern Ireland were more closely linked with Great Britain than with the rest of the country, and were very much more akin to Scottish Catholic areas than to the rest of the UK. The prime minister,

David Lloyd George, tried to mediate the situation. The Earl of Derby, who had been Chancellor of the Exchequer, resigned, saying that he could not serve under an Irish PM. A further crisis, this time around the Irish Sea, was averted when the Northern Ireland MPs brought in their own government. It had an MP for each of the 10 counties of Northern Ireland. The outbreak of war in 1914 changed all of this. The governments of the UK and Ireland were merged, as the King appointed a prime minister for both. Redmond was in no position to complain, and, in fact, did not want to. Ulster was to be part of the empire. But his parties were nearly all Protestant, and unionist, which meant that they were to be represented by Unionist MPs, most of whom were elected as members of the Unionist Party, which was also overwhelmingly Protestant. The Irish Parliamentary Party (IPP) was by contrast, mostly Catholic, and many of
