approach." The most important generalization is that data functions in machine learning can be represented by neural networks. One of the more in-depth studies of neural networks, using Texas instrument CCDs to observe the liquid junction potential in an ion channel, was carried out by David Fairhall and Quanshui Yuan. "We'll call this a fair amount of work and commitment. Still, the glory goes to the students." He's given a lot of awards, like the Ig Nobel Prize, the Gairdner Foundation Fellowship, and the Eetfweck Prize. "One of the recurring things I hear is, 'this is the first time I've ever considered mathematics.'" (Phil Davis, Duke University) Fast-forward to 1999 and Fairhall gave a talk at the conference of the International Society for Neurobiology, the ICNC (International Congress of Neural Computation), in Prague. John Sullivan was there as well, but he was distracted by talks on neural networks, mostly from France, which were using Bayesian techniques. Sullivan's impression was that Fastrak was a machine learning shop, and Rob Loge and Marvin Oberman of IBM were better at the neural network kind. In the summer of the same year, Fairhall and Sullivan spent time in the darkroom together. They often thought about how the brain works, sometimes at night. In Fairhall's case, his brain was often not functioning. He sometimes wondered when some mathematical models would be useful. It would take years for the appropriate questions to be asked, as people have often taken linear separation models to be the end of the story. "I would come in and [Sullivan] would ask me to go through the journal, to read some of the things he had put up on the wall on the different
