Our goal is to make our world better with our videos. Spontaneous vesicocutaneous fistulae are a clinical syndrome which in approximately 7% of patients are secondary to intravesical prostate cancer. They are characterized by painful, necrotic skin and sinus tracts that often evolve into spontaneous, recurrent, and recurrently infectious vesicocutaneous fistulae which commonly originate from the upper genital tract, such as the ectopic insertion of the uretero-vesical junction into the skin. Vesicocutaneous fistulae are often difficult to control and frequently refractory to treatment. The preferred treatment is generally radical cystoprostatectomy with construction of a neobladder. Some patients, however, may refuse cystectomy, or present with metastatic disease and/or other medical problems preventing such radical surgical intervention. There is a need for methods of treating patients with intravesical prostate cancer without undergoing radical cystoprostatectomy. Prior methods of treating uretero-vesical junction or uretero-cutaneous junction fistulae have included attempts at endoscopic ligation using rubber band or surgical steel clamp placement. Such methods have not been satisfactory due to the fact that they are accompanied by significant morbidity including: increased long-term risk of incontinence, bladder retention and infection. Further, attempts to sterilize the urine drainage system has been done with an 'artificial' neobladder, wherein the ureters are 6d1f23a050
