
nuclear MPs led by the former Labour leader John Smith will endorse plans to build new reactors around the world, according to extracts from a draft document to be published later this month. The draft report will urge ministers to re-introduce the right to build new reactors, but will also argue that the construction of new nuclear power stations in the UK is unnecessary, a disclosure that is expected to enrage union leaders. The document will urge the government to make recommendations to Parliament on the siting of future new reactors after 2020, with a clear indication of which areas, such as the Scottish west coast, should be prioritised and will not be subject to the 70% requirement. But it will also state that nuclear power should only be considered when “clean alternative energy generation technologies” are “no longer a viable option”. Smith told the Sunday Herald: “There is a review of the energy sector which is taking place at the moment. It is a timely review and is needed. Parliament has the right to know what the government’s priorities are c6a93da74d
