5.2.1 The Customer is granted a nonexclusive, nontransferable right to have free access to all documents which are made available to Customer for purposes of evaluation and evaluation training of any Software provided by HACK Techsoft. 5.2.2 Customer is hereby granted a nonexclusive, nontransferable right to have free access to the Software with a view of evaluating and evaluating training purposes. At the expiration of the trial period, HACK Techsoft may, at its discretion, request the Customer to sign a nondisclosure agreement, a non-competition agreement, and/or other agreements, containing such terms and conditions as HACK Techsoft shall deem appropriate. 5.2.3 The use of the Software and the associated documentation is governed by HACK Techsoft's Technical Support Policy and the accompanying Technical Support User Guide, which are incorporated herein by reference. 5.2.5 Any modification, upgrade, or patch to the Software will only be made available by HACK Techsoft to the Customer and only after the Customer has signed the nondisclosure agreement and/or the non-competition agreement. The modified, upgraded, or patched Software will only be provided by HACK Techsoft as an EXE file that the Customer will be allowed to review and evaluate. The modified, upgraded, or patched Software and the documentation associated therewith will be protected by confidentiality and copyright. This confidentiality and copyright will be respected for all time. 'Course, if you decide to work in your garage, then you'll probably want to start with the tools from C3D Labs. If you never license your software, then your work may never get any recognition, and it may never catch on, and you won't ever make a living, unless you've got a good game plan. But, if you have a plan for your app, and to keep it useful to your customers, you can make a go of it. Your app can become a community affair, and you may even get some press. I'm sure you've heard some of the first CAD apps were ridiculous--customers wanted a working CAD app that really did what CAD apps were supposed to do. Those days are long gone, though. Once, to get traction, you'd have to create a killer app. Since then, customers have come to expect the more "design-friendly" features, such as layers, symmetry, and many others. It's not worth it to go as fast as you can--because customers don't want just a few features.
