Through this study, we explored barriers and facilitators experienced by patients towards healthcare seeking through the perspective of a patient who did not seek healthcare for depression or anxiety. Exploring barriers from the perspective of patients who sought healthcare for depression or anxiety is important as it allows for confirmation of our findings and the exploration of other issues, which we did not assess in this study, but might be barriers for OST patients. Our study also provides an overall understanding of how patients in OST experience barriers and facilitators towards healthcare seeking. This analysis is beneficial to the social service sector to help identify barriers experienced by patients, so they can be addressed, and to healthcare practitioners who might fail to recognize the barriers experienced by patients. Lastly, mixed methods allows us to better understand patient perspectives and experiences. This information can be added to the current knowledge on barriers towards healthcare seeking, which is already important to patients who do not seek healthcare.
