getting around payback is a little more satisfying, too, thanks to the ability to drift. this lets you control your angle with the right stick, which is a little like how you shift in a real car. you can get some weird edges where you can slide sideways without being out of control, but this is mostly a vehicle of last resort. you're better off playing it safe and staying on the road. but the real stars of the show are the cars. they're all the same, of course, but the camo scheme on each model adds a lot of visual variety. the base model of each car is the same, but the various add-ons to the different cars are often visually distinct, so it's easy to tell which one you're looking at if you need to. every part of the car can be upgraded, and there are 30 different parts to choose from, so customizing the car is satisfying. the only problem with this is that it's not always clear what the difference between a base car and a different upgrade is, so it can be tricky to figure out which parts you'll actually want. you can't use parts on the wrong car, and there's no quick-view for the different cars, so you need to read the descriptions carefully. the one area where payback falls short is in the customization of the cars. since this is a racing game, i'd have expected the cars to have a bunch of options and sliders to customize the basic car. i've only really found a couple of them, and one of those is only for the ability to use nitrous. everything else is pretty straight forward. a mission in the first races of the game sees a series of crashes, and the cause of each crash is determined by a speed card.

the game is riddled with speed cards that give you varying abilities, from the ability to roll over your top speed and its like stopping a car to perform stunts, to the ability to roll over your opponent and make them crash. but no matter what you get, you'll need more speed cards for your next mission.
