In contrast to the Visual Object Model Language (VOML), which was only available on the Macintosh, AutoLISP had a Windows version. AutoLISP was originally developed at the laboratory of the French National Center for Scientific Research (CNRS) in the early 1970s, and was originally named "FLIW". In 1983 it was adopted by the CNRS as part of the development software for the ABSPLAYS family of software. In 1992 it was adopted by Autodesk as part of the Visual LISP family and subsequently as AutoLISP. Later, in 1996, AutoLISP was included as part of the Autodesk Delphi development environment. The product was in use in companies such as the BBC, American Airlines, IBM, and the US military.

To install an Autodesk suite that includes multiple products, a separate batch file is required for each product. The batch file includes a separate code block for each product. The code block includes the product ID and the product key for one of the products being installed. However, the same suite serial number and product key are used for all products. The path to the Incl folder is specific to your system. This folder is created when you install a distribution or Autodesk installation on your system, and it contains all the files that Autodesk uses to install the software.
