the data processing language is an extensible text language, known as dcs (dynamic component services), which is an xml-based interoperability mechanism designed to enable third-party developers to extend or replace the applications by means of a control interface, in such a way that geospatial applications are able to integrate extensions such as that offered by erdas imagine. ardif is a powerful and flexible geographic information system providing image analysis and 3d modeling of aerial and satellite images. it uses some of the best ideas from erdas imagine software, and adds many new options for 3d visualization and analysis of aerial and satellite images. it uses the same style of modeling tools, such as imaging, 3d viewing, and batch processing, that are part of the erdas imagine tool suite. however, the ardif software is not freeware, but is instead a complete package, priced at about $3000 per licensed user. the application is designed in such a way that it can be used with the latest windows operating systems. the latest software versions are also available for download from uits. it offers the user a wide range of functionalities as the basis of the applications for the use of various remote sensing platforms.

additionally, it provides remote sensing and geographic information system tools. the application is also available in the erdesoft application environment, which also includes the erdas imagine toolset as well as erdas erdas construction. after installing the software, it is possible to open erdas imagine. here you can add a project and access the application main window, where you will be able to create, preview and edit the project. the main window also contains the output options and features, as well as the calendar, file manager, links..
