The wind and solar energy is freely available and environment friendly. The combination of energy sources provides more reliable power than any one source alone. These hybrid vehicles will become independent of oil. Based on the research and other findings, the hybrid vehicle will become popular and people will be interested on this. So this research is more important when considering the current investments by both Government and the Auto industry. This hybrid vehicles technology will play an important role in future as they are the vehicles of tomorrow. Marketing and sales will not require more investment since they are eco- friendly and better than existing models. The aim of the paper is to give the current trends of the design, operation and control requirement of wind-solar hybrid energy systems. The paper highlights the economic attractiveness of hybrid vehicles and need for this in the future auto industry. Third, the development of new infrastructures for alternative energy systems creates opportunities for insisting that energy designs and decisions explicitly incorporate an awareness of the social dimensions of energy transitions. While retrofitting existing infrastructures can be enormously expensive, many benefits can be achieved without greatly increasing the cost of new systems when incorporated at the design stage. Policy-makers, industries, communities, and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) are starting to think more critically about how energy infrastructures are being designed, built, and rebuilt. Regulators have shown greater awareness that multiple trajectories of energy development co-exist and that increasing diversity rather than settling on a single dominant system is a good outcome. Promisingly, this critique is already being applied to renewable energy technologies, whereas fossil fuels went largely unchallenged until long after their entrenchment. As seen in community, union, and NGO responses to the siting of wind and solar farms, or the development of specific technologies such as electric cars, engaged publics increasingly want a say in how energy is delivered, for what uses, where, and to whom.
