One fear many people have is that Lightroom will be so similar to Photoshop that there will not be differences between the two applications. That certainly is true for some features, though Adobe has adopted many of PS's best practices. For example, the Tools panel found in Lightroom is a lot like Photoshop, but with new buttons. New Lightroom Photoshop updates can be installed via the Photoshop CS6 update site, too. There are two really big changes. The first is an Auto Import feature that, when enabled, it looks at the EXIF data of JPEG files and automatically attempts to import the histogram information from Adobe's own PSD files into your new Lightroom catalog. The second is a "hamburger menu" that Pixar very nearly copied, but not quite, from Star Wars Episode 1: The Phantom Menace. This menu, which is controlled by a regular left-mouse button, allows you to do things like create multiple tabs, access Smart Preview features within the editing environment, and much more. Lightroom 4.3 incorporates more than 800 new features and improvements. It can do almost everything that Photoshop CC can (or perhaps more, since Lightroom is becoming a powerful photo editing tool). Bottom line is, Lightroom is a solid replacement for many photo editors. It's becoming a powerhouse within the creative editing world. Whether you're a pro user who deals with raw image formats on a regular basis, an occasional user, or maybe you've stuck with Photoshop for its powerful features, Lightroom is a great tool for the job.

As for keyboards, the standard keyboard key arrangement means that you are using your computer with a PC layout. This makes it easy to learn and understand everything. Your Q, W, E, R, and T keys are all in that same location. An ALT+D has the same functionality but is on the Caps Lock key. When using websites can be difficult using the keyboard and will require using a mouse to perform common actions. On websites you are able to use the space bar, backspace, and enter buttons while also being able to use the left, right, and forward buttons. These buttons will then act as a tab, back button, and browser-forward button depending on the browser you are using. Some websites also have the possibility of using the CTRL+C to copy a piece of text by pressing CTRL+V. The different browser-types have different key arrangements such as the Edge browser is similar to Chrome and the Safari browser and IE browser are similar to Internet Explorer. On the mouse side, it is important to always make sure to always have a pointer when working on a computer. If you do not, you can accidentally click or type things that you did not want to do. Even if you are not on a website you should always have a mouse with a pointer which means that you can navigate around your computer easily by clicking on the mouse wheel if you are on a website. I have also written a blog article about how to get started with a device that does not have a mouse I recommend reading to better understand how to navigate your computer without a mouse pointer. 933d7f57e6
