When we ask clients, "What does it mean to be a great communicator?", most often the following are the responses, "It means communicating well in the context of how an audience receives communications." Or "It means using a style and tone that creates a positive impression." These are all important elements of messaging, but they don't include the most critical component of messaging. It is the role a communicator has in a work environment to motivate and direct others. It is commonly assumed that good communicators, such as sales people, are persuasive. But what is true is that people who use their influence within the organization in ways that motivate others are actually great communicators. Consider that a sales person may make a direct recommendation, but the one who makes the final call on the product or feature receives the credit for it. As a business owner, you want to motivate and direct people, and be an influence in the work environment so that others look to you for direction. It means helping people succeed. It means using this influence to motivate them to do what they're paid to do and for which you're responsible. You're involved with a large number of people every day, all working toward the same goal, yet you are responsible for directing them.

Successful communicators don't just know how to effectively communicate, they know how to motivate their audience to engage. It means creating a positive impression. This may sound like semantics, but it's critical. A negative impression – communicating in ways that don't make the listener feel good – will only serve to de-motivate an audience. Good communicators know how to make people feel good about the message. It means your listeners make a strong impression of you in a positive light. In other words, it means you influence other people in a positive way and don't make them feel like they're being bullied. Good communicators aren't aggressive or pushy. They aren't bullies. By relying on the quality of their communication, they influence others in a positive way. The words they choose, the tone of their voice, and
