

one has a ceramic casing and a metal case. Why is it better to have a metal case? There is a cheaper card which has a plastic casing and a metal case and is in my "usual" place, but that one is SanDisk. Should I get that one or not? I have read a few posts about how worse a metal casing is for a SD card and a ceramic one is better, but my question is why does the cheaper SanDisk one have a metal casing? A: Metal can be a bad choice for a card. I have a number of cards where the contacts have shorted out, where the reason for this is that the metal contacts in the card were wearing away, making the card unusable. They were plastic in those cards. On the other hand, some electronics that use a metal contacts with a plastic shell can be cheaper and require less space. We have to keep in mind that there are price points for low end electronic devices to be made for an extremely low price. The rules are different there than for higher end products. A: The metal case is not as reliable. It is cheaper. A: Some of the reasons for metal being cheaper or worse are given here. You can dig deeper with a google search for relevant terms, such as "metal card", which will give you tons of good information about the issues, eg: Metal component fatigue Removing the typical single-side, single-side edge of a 04aeff104c
