I am afraid that the usability of Lightroom 5 lacks a bit, especially with the failure to provide a rather necessary hierarchy-starting Image prefs dialog. For example, Lightroom has to setup image exposure, ND filter, brightness, and color balance in the lower right of the window, while opening the Color Follow, Animate, and other panels, and sometimes having to close and open dialogs. It takes less than one minute to set the download quality (bitrate) value, optimize resolution, or disable Indexing, because, at least once, we are doing these things all the time. We have learned that Lightroom 5, in this give, is basically the next-generation version of a standard image editor, and for this reason, users will find the workflows much easier with Adobe Photoshop or Lightroom 5. Photo Streams can now be accessed in Lightroom 5, too. The biggest downside is we can no longer interchange direct output between Lightroom and any other imaging tool we want. But, obviously, Lightroom 5 will not replace Photoshop more than it will replace other imaging tools and applications. It is an impressive upgrade to Lightroom, though, and a lot better than previous versions. As mentioned earlier, Unlike the Facebook's Like etc, the Twitter's Follow etc are not post-actions. Twitter's Follow system comes in many flavours: people you follow, polls, hashtags, keywords etc. The numbers don't look good—for once, Apple gets it right. Photoshop is one of those ubiquitous apps that everyone has bought and used in the past. It had always been a cutting-edge version of Photoshop, one that you simply didn't want to miss out on; however, with its smaller, lighter, and more modern appearance, it simply doesn't stand out from its competition. This update gives it more style and makes it a more pleasant experience for more people than ever before.
