Lightroom is a great editor, but Adobe wants me to use Photoshop to edit images? Really? When I can directly enable particular Photoshop editing features that Lightroom lacks, why should I need to make the same changes in the same way using Adobe Photoshop? Other improvements include new LUTs (color management) and the ability to create and edit multiple LUT profiles. I can also export a "Reference" image to use as a canvas when applying LUTs to others. In the past, I had to export a reference from that image, and import and apply it at the time I was working in a different image. Lightroom 6 comes with a fantastic Editor in a Black and White Suite, and that alone is worth the $79 upgrade fee. Using that tool is faster than I'm used to, and far better at skin tone baking. It's physically easier to navigate as well, with lots of familiar shortcuts like "Adjust Sharpness", and easily move about in the image. I'm also now able to edit my images in Grayscale to make them look more like they were created in a color photo lab, removing noise, overexposure and best of all, the pinkish-orange color cast that makes it impossible to fix in CS6. The Mac version of Photoshop CC 2017 boosts speed and productivity as compared to previous versions, and is more inclusive for educators and students than ever before. Despite the competition, this year, with the release of Photoshop CC 2017, I found the same tool. It's just as powerful, just as fast, and just as intuitive.
