The new law takes effect at the end of April, and requires drivers to be over the age of 18, and not have more than three alcohol-related convictions or face licence suspensions or suspensions of 90 days or more. The legislation was introduced after the rash of last winter's alcohol-related crashes that included the deaths of 45 people, and almost 4,000 injuries that were reported. It was introduced in Parliament by Public Safety Minister Steven Blaney, the Conservative government's point man on crime prevention, and passed through the House of Commons in the dying days of the federal election campaign. "The message is clear: if you drink and drive, your licence will be suspended immediately. Driving without a licence will mean a jail sentence," Blaney told reporters in Ottawa Tuesday, where he was flanked by New Brunswick and Quebec premiers. The government says it consulted with the auto-driving industry, which supports the new law, to shape its provisions. "It's a very clear message to the public, it's a fairly tough measure to enforce and it will help improve public safety because it will get people off the roads and away from the scene of the crash if they are drinking and driving," said Gene Zion, research director for the Canadian Automobile Association (CAA). Drivers can still be pulled over if they are suspected of having been drinking. Over the last five years, 18-year-olds have accounted for the highest proportion of drink-related crashes, and between 2010-2012 there were 1,215 injuries and 12 deaths among people aged 18 and under, according to a CAA study published in January 2014.
