The new default app for the iPad Pro is now called Lightroom CC, and its name reflects some of the changes to its features. The most obvious difference is the absence of a dedicated painting or art mode. That only means that what you're looking at is static once you've opened it, so you're not just looking at a new feature; you're seeing the result of you having previously painted, sketched or shot a photo or video. The new iPad feature is called Adobe Reverse Sketch, and is designed to help you look at reality and try to come up with a new image of it. It works by placing people, places or objects on your screen and you look at those objects. The app then records what you look at, with an advanced face and object detector, and you can take a screen shot of the result. It's a fairly simple tool, but it's a good one. You can then use it as a starting point for your own images. As is the case in other areas, Deep Learning right now is in its infancy. Right now it's mostly used to recognize features and objects that you've already highlighted, so it doesn't replace the need for manually scanning photos into a program. Once the AI gets a little better in that area, we will see it possibly used for features like Adobe Camera RAW and Photoshop Color Control Panel (Adobe is not yet using AI for the Photo Modifier panel). Adobe as always is a pioneer of AI and machine learning, so I'm sure this will happen eventually. For those interested in the layout of the various layers in Adobe Photoshop, Lightroom is a good choice. Its layer panel displays tools, adjustments, and information all in a way similar to Photoshop. In fact, Adobe could have made the adjustment and adjustment tools a bit more similar. The panel is very simple and easy to use, but it's also very small. In fact, the control bar options are an easy way in and out of the application. However, the adjustment brush is not displayed in the dark, which is a bit strange and possibly a violation of the OS X Guidelines, unless the application has loaded and is using a special mode that switches the display for brushes. The Live Filter section and Credits page are also missing many important adjustments. Finally, the section on the website and the shareable presets and slideshows need to be more user-friendly. Meanwhile, Lightroom is the only free version of the program that comes with unlimited use of imported files. Make sure that is emphasized better for the free user.
