An Amazon staffer has confirmed with us that the USB Type-C to Lightning adapter for the iPad is out of stock, but to no one's surprise, the same is true of the Lightning cable — which means it's most likely going to take up to a few months before they become available again. Another weird quirk of the mobile device performance is that the computer apps are not responsive in the same way you're used to when using a touchscreen device. For example, toolbar buttons that relate directly to the work you're doing are not presented immediately when you click on them. Yet, you have access to all the tools you need immediately, which is why the mobile Photoshop apps are never laggy when you need to work quickly on an object. UPDATE: The way it worked previously is to drag an object or tool onto the Quick Launch bar. This still works, but now you need to perform double-click to open the tool, and you are presented with a larger tool window if you want to scale or rotate it. If you don't want to display the larger window, while you're within the tool, you can perform a right-click and choose to close the larger window. The transition from the iOS app on the Apple Pencil to the mobile apps is even more impressive. During the process of capturing the illustrations, the iPad screen remains blank while the Pencil, along with Photoshop app, displays the image. You can even zoom in and out by moving the Pencil in and out of the application. The iOS apps also accept all the recent iOS changes to file types, which will allow you to edit files using the new AAPL format as well as backwards compatibility. At the moment, I will say that I had a few problems exporting the images from iOS. The iPad numbers didn't match the figures that Lightroom produced, and I even ended up with two image files of close size. I believe that this is partly because of the fact that there is a minor difference between 1-bit and 8-bit compression, something that should not be a problem for most people. But I also had the problem when exporting images from LCD screens, even though this was a problem with the software and not with how the iPad operates. I made sure that the projector and the screen were set to "Direct Input" mode in the settings, but it wasn't enough.
