Alfredo de Bragança, Duke of Portugal Duke Alfredo de Bragança (Portuguese: Duque Alfredo de Bragança, 1814 - 1910) was a claimant to the former throne of Portugal. Biography Duke Alfredo de Bragança, "O Alfeu", was a son of Infanta Maria Francisca of Spain, his mother, and of the Portuguese King John VI, who had been brought up in the United States and died without a legitimate heir. He was born in Saint Petersburg, Russian Empire, in 1814. In 1831 he and his sister Teresa claimed the Portuguese throne, after an interview in Rio de Janeiro between them and Queen Maria I of Portugal. Alfredo was later captured and imprisoned in Rio de Janeiro, but escaped and fled to Brazil, where he raised a crew of followers. When the death of King John VI in 1826 created an open question whether he was the legitimate successor of Portugal's throne, Alfredo announced himself a claimant to the throne of Portugal and petitioned to the British and French governments to recognize him. Meanwhile, Teresa of Braganza, who had been born at the Royal Court of Lisbon and had been raised as a Portuguese princess, was raised by her mother Queen Maria I, who fostered her hopes of becoming the legitimate monarch of Portugal, in the event of the death of John VI without legitimate descendants. In 1840, after John VI had named her the heiress presumptive to his throne, Teresa became queen regnant. Alfredo remained in Brazil, but during the ephemeral administration of his sister Teresa he organised what became the 2nd Battalion of the Army of the North, known as the "Red Battalion", as an independent unit, fighting the Portuguese authorities in the Bay of Guarani. He also called the rights of the legitimate heir to the throne of Portugal, his nephew King Pedro V of Portugal. His brother-in-law, Don Carlos, another pretender to the throne of Portugal, fled to England
