But even if they do roll out desktop interfaces for Android and Windows on Day 1, users will still be faced with snippets of code that have to be uploaded to their cloud, and run. I guess we'll just have to hope that getting a response for most of your photo editing actions, on a Chromebook, is easier than on a smartphone. One of my favourite (and most used) programs is PS. Pre CS3 I was happy with it. CS3 and onward I always had issues with the UI simplicity and speed. PS is good at what it was made for (separate tools for creating images, retouch, layouts, etc.). I don't see the need for this integration, as every program already has their own tools and can synch on the web. I wish I could have a lot of my work on PS and take it with me, so Adobe would let me export as PSD files, that would be a "next" big step for me. Just what the title says really – my word for it is that you can't beat the price. It is an awesome program to have and not to have. But I've always had a love/hate relationship with it because of the sheer amount of complications with it. It just isn't any simpler to use. I wish it is as simple as the best would be. I think you could get a lot of users with this list just for the different features. I'm still impressed with the new performance and features available. This release is appealing to my pro users because you can now do some of their work in the browser without dropping to the desktop. Yes, the only thing that really gets screwed up is a Smart filter. I used that at work to do the corrective processing. Unfortunately it threw my channel 3 values all over the place and had a terrible effect of the correction.
